of course, solely on the authority of the Scriptures) should be. Should he find the verse ambiguous ("Whither thou goest I will go," for example, could mean all sorts of things vis-à-vis the Blake Proposal), the player has a number of further options:

(a) If he has declared himself a fundamentalist, he simply shouts the verse loudly over and over again until the other players resignedly let him move his counter. (b) If he is a liberal, he turns the question over to The Exegetes (a group of any three players who then retire to ponder the matter indefinitely). (c) If he is an ecumaniac (defined as "a Christian who loves all branches of Christendom save his own"), he will draw from a third pile of cards for further enlightenment. This pile is labeled "Tradition" and consists of quotations from St. Augustine, St. Anselm, St. John (Calvin), Pascal, Kierkegaard, Niebuhr, Bonhoeffer and H. Jackson Forstman. By collating the inspired biblical text and the rich resources of Tradition, the player can usually arrive at a satisfactory answer.

Should the latter still not be possible, the game goes into a new phase in which all the players discuss the matter in rigid parliamentary fashion. In the Presbyterian version of I Protest, this phase is called General Assembly; in the Episcopalian, it is General Convention. Only anti-ecumaniacs will insist on calling it Vatican Council.

Resources are not yet exhausted should a stalemate once again ensue, for if this happens, General Assembly or General Convention (whatever the denominational term) has a further procedure open. Interestingly enough, this is the only procedure common to all versions of I Protest. It is entitled Appointing a Committee to Consider the Matter and Report at the Next Annual Meeting.

It is then the next player's move.

But these descriptions have not yet gotten to the real heart of I Protest: the move (always available to every player) that most truly depicts the genius of Protestantism. Anytime a player becomes dissatisfied with the course of the game or even with the rules, he is entitled to draw from the largest pile of cards on the whole board, which is labeled "The Right of Private Judgment." (Each card is blank, but no one is aware of this ahead of time.) The disgruntled player simply says clearly and distinctly, "I appeal to The Right of Private Judgment." He thereupon draws a card, reads from it whatever move he wishes, makes it, and motions to the next player to take his turn.

Since there is no court of appeal higher than The Right of Private Judgment, the other players must either accept his decision or vote to Withdraw Recognition. Should they do this the player thus discriminated against says loudly and prophetically, "I Protest," withdraws his counter from the board and Starts Another Denomination. This is done by merely spinning the counter until he gets a 2 and a 3 in succession, knowing that where two or three are gathered together, it is legitimate to have an Organizational Meeting.

The player who starts the Most New Denominations in the course of an evening is The Winner!

The New Morality An important debate

COMMONWEAL devoted most of its January 14 issue to a provocative and significant debate on "the new morality." The two contributors, professor joseph fletcher of the Episcopal Theological School, and father herbert Mccabe, o.p., editor of the English Catholic monthly The New Blackfriars, are both distinguished theologians. Their essays confront a rich variety of theoretical and practical issues: ethical norms, sexual morality, nuclear warfare, among others.
